Papers in Progress:

“Contentious Politics as Complex Network Processes: Environmental Protest in Japan.” (Under review at Working Papers series, American Journal of Cultural Sociology)

Jeff Broadbent and John Sonnett, “Fault Lines in Global Mitigation Discourse: A Multinational Composite.” To be submitted along with multiple national case studies to the journal Climatic Change to reach a wide interdisciplinary audience. We plan to submit this set of articles to the journal in March 2013.

Edited set of papers by the research teams in the project on Comparing Climate Change Policy Networks (Compon. The PI Broadbent is currently editing the papers from eighteen cases, along with an Introduction and the preceding “Fault Lines. . .” paper, to be submitted to the journal Climatic Change for a special issue. These papers analyze the data of the Compon project on newspaper coverage and framing of global climate change and national mitigation of greenhouse gas emissions. The papers, all by local academic teams, include the cases of Canada, the US, Mexico, Brazil, UK, Sweden, Germany, Switzerland, Greece, Portugal, India, New Zealand, Japan, China, South Korea and Taiwan, Indonesia and Vietnam. The editors of the journal Climatic Change have agreed to consider the whole set of papers for a special issue. We plan to submit this set of papers to the journal in November 2012.

Jeffrey Broadbent. “Entangled Networks: Complex Power Formations in US, German & Japanese Politics.” This paper compares three policy networks in the three countries, highlights the comparisons and draws out the theoretical implications for state-society power relations and policy formation processes.

Jeffrey Broadbent, Our Common Addiction: Fossil Fuel Civilization and its Transformation under Climate Change Pressure. Book project. The book will compare the response of different societies to the call for mitigating their greenhouse gas emissions, seeking through that comparison to identify the fundamental factors hampering a more effective national and global response. The study includes societies exhibiting different levels of success and failure in mitigation as well as different background societal and ecological conditions that affect those responses. This book will be based on the empirical data and findings from the eighteen case studies being conducted in the Compon project. The book project has been solicited by the ASA Rose Monograph series as one of its projects, with intention to be published with the Russell Sage Press. I hope to submit this book in 2013.

“Culture and Authoritarian Logic: Regime Response to Environmental Activism in Japan, Taiwan, South Korea, and China” with Jun Jin (Tsing Hua University), Yu-Ju Chien and EunHye Yoo (both University of Minnesota). This paper investigates whether remaining Confucian cultural relational norms of state paternalism toward popular suffering in four East Asian societies have any influence upon how the state treats environmental movements in those societies. Available as Working Paper at website of East Asia Institute.

“Pathways to Participation: I/NGO Voice in Japanese Climate Change Politics,” (with Yutaka Tsujinaka and Stephanie Devitt). Based on the analysis of the 1997 GEON policy network survey data for Japan.

“Context in Movement.” This paper critiques social movement theories for their reductionistic approaches to the holistic context that social movements operate within. It presents ways to produce a more holistic analysis.
